Mummification

- Ancient Egyptians & South Americans
- Took up to 70 days to remove the internal organs
- Around 3,000 BC mummers treated the bodies with natural salts that removes damaging liquids within the body. Then the bodies are covered in a warm resin and then 150 yards of linen strips that cover the body in layers
- The naturally preserved mummies as a way to prove that the person existed after death

Embalming

- 1 step of the mummification process that preserves the body from decomposing completely
- Believed to have started during the Civil War time and President Lincoln encouraged this process that allowed lost soldiers to get returned to their hometowns for a burial
- Formaldehyde is a quick method for disinfecting and preserving a body
- Dr. Thomas Holmes "father of American embalming"

Both

• Believed that the full mummification process is not used today but embalming is still used widely in funeral homes

 Ancient Egyptians were thought to originate the mummification and embalming processes but the South Americans started 2,000 years before (around 5,000 BC)

Other information

- The dead bodies were pickled in things such as vinegar, wine, and stronger spirits
- Egyptian religion had the belief of immortality and physical resurrection
- Egyptian religion also believed that when the elements of life (soul, name, shadow, heart, and body) the person would be resurrected just like the god Osiris
- A more elaborate method used for the royal contained taking out the brain, intestines, and other organs to then wash them in palm wine. Then the organs were placed in a vase filled with herbs. The body gets stitched and covered in hydrated sodium carbonate until the body dries out. The body gets wrapped in cotton bandages with a gummy substance. Only skin and bones remained by the end
